AUTONOMOUS PROVINCE
OF TRENTO

The sixth edition of the Festival of Economics marks another step forward for Trentino, which responded to the crisis by strengthening the traditional activities that continue to make it a competitive and strategic territory. The anti-crisis package adopted by the Autonomous Province contains several strong points recognized as innovative both within Italy and abroad. On the social policy front, we have introduced an income safety-net programme to combat processes of impoverishment and urban decay, while our pro-business investment strategy is designed to support and promote the utilization of human resources and new technology for relaunching competitiveness across the province. One issue that is particularly close to our heart is knowledge; indeed, it should surprise no-one that the Autonomy Statute makes provision for a new provincial law on universities. In our vision for the future, even more than it already is today, Trentino will be a European region of knowledge, which aspires to achieve a virtuous equilibrium between the various engines on which the region's development depends: research, training, universities, businesses, politics and institutions. Only if these engines work at full speed can this "systemic architecture" be built and strengthened to enable it to fulfil its enormous potential. Once again, it is the dual global and local track that helps us to think in terms of development and international openness. Indeed, only in a perspective that values local specificities while simultaneously aiming to attract high-quality investors from the rest of the world, can Trentino successfully navigate the choppy waters of globalization. The province's industrial pole recognizes in the University of Trento, the Bruno Kessler Foundation and the Mach Foundation, the key partners for this enterprise: an important step towards becoming a fully paid-up member of the global economy. The challenge is to aim even higher, and in this sense the Festival provides a special vantage point for viewing the world, a 360-degree panorama that enables us to identify and redraw the horizons of the future. Humanity and communities cannot live without dreaming of the future and of everything that helps realize these dreams in good politics and good administration. The same dream that for six years now, the Festival of Economics has embraced.

Lorenzo Dellai

President of the Autonomous Province of Trento

MUNICIPALITY
OF TRENTO

After five increasingly popular editions, given extensive coverage by the media and followed by an attentive and informed public, this year's Festival of Economics has set itself a new challenge. Not that of making do with the prestige and popularity it has gained to date, but of raising its game once again in order to identify better ways of dealing with the intrinsically challenging theme of the "Borders of Economic Freedom".

Flexibility and versatility are surely two of the strong points of a Festival which, in the past five years, has played an invaluable role as compass, or better still thermometer, capable of describing and measuring various, at times momentous, transformations. There is no better explanation for the success of this event that began in 2006, when the second Prodi government was formed (the same year that Giorgio Napolitano was elected President of the Republic and Italy was victorious at the world cup). An event that grew up with the subprime crisis and reached maturity with the explosion of a crisis whose aftermath continues to be felt today.

The new five-year period inaugurated by this Festival began with the revolts in North Africa, a region where the absence of democracy has existed alongside an anything but liberal economy. I believe that this year's Festival will help us once again to find the right key for interpreting the troubled and largely unforeseen times we live in. I believe that our meetings will yield some responses and perhaps some questions, novel ideas, and food for thought. What is certain is that both for our city and for visitors, the Festival is a not-to-be-missed occasion.

Alessandro Andreatta
Mayor of Trento

The five editions of the Festival of Economics, which since 2006 has enlivened the streets of Trento, have demonstrated the extent to which the debate on economic issues can capture the public imagination. To continue this experience, which has proved so rewarding for those who have participated, there is to my mind no better theme this year than that of freedom. A term that has burst back onto centre stage in this phase of the economic crisis and of major political, social, cultural and international transformation.

Speaking of freedom and economics, my thoughts are drawn to the discussions we all heard up to a few years ago when many politicians and illustrious economists wanted to convince us that development could only be achieved at the cost of removing every constraint on the freedom of individuals and businesses. According to this vision, the market with its own mechanisms and efficiency would correct eventual systemic distortions, guaranteeing us a radiant future of increasing prosperity. The economic crisis has taught us that in reality things are much more complicated and that freedom without rules can produce substantial damage. Damage that often affects the quality of life of persons who are entirely extraneous to the decision-making processes that led to disaster in the first place. In other words, the rule that “if you break, you pay” no longer seems to apply.

Any reflection on the issue of freedom and the definition of rules, including at supranational level, and on the new role that public decision makers are called on to fulfil with respect to the markets, necessarily implies opening a debate on the role of each one of us and on the concepts of autonomy and responsibility.

In this complex situation we must never forget that what can make the difference is the ability to stimulate personal initiative, courage and entrepreneurial flexibility. This vitality can only arise from the proper promotion – in a context of clear and precise rules – of talent and merit. It is from this standpoint that schools and universities are called on to play a leading role in guaranteeing a solid and modern educational system.

It is my hope that the ideas which will emerge from the high-level debates conducted during the Festival can act as a catalyst for the best energies and as a stimulus for a renewed commitment to the future, in every sphere of activity.

THE BORDERS OF ECONOMIC FREEDOM

In the early 1990s, from the privileged vantage point of the OECD, I witnessed the countries of the former soviet bloc make the transition to a market economy. On one of my missions to Eastern Europe I was sent to Bratislava, via Vienna. Seeing as how the plane was delayed and I risked being responsible for the cancellation of an important meeting, a Viennese colleague offered to give me a lift to Slovakia, driving through the corridor reserved for Austrian citizens. According to his calculations, this would save me at least one hour. In the circumstances, I happily accepted his offer. The only problem was that although I had a diplomatic passport, I am not, nor was I then, an Austrian citizen. The Austrian and Slovakian checkpoints in that corridor stand a few kilometres apart. There was no problem on the Austrian side where our passports were not even requested. The Viennese licence plate sufficed. But on arriving at the Slovak border the zealous officials who asked for our documents, on discovering my true nationality, refused to let us pass. We were forced to turn tail. This time round the Austrian officials, surprised at seeing us back so soon, asked for our passports, and on establishing that I was neither Slovakian, nor Austrian, also refused to let us through. Long telephone calls to the Austrian embassy and a fax clarifying the objective of our visit were required before we were finally allowed back into Austria and from there, into Slovakia, through a border point that was also accessible to non-Austrians. Obviously the meeting was rescheduled. But during that hour spent in “middle earth” I imagined what it would have been like to live in those five kilometres that separated the two borders, between a mostly planned economy and a market economy with a strong public sector presence.

The Great Recession has left us many middle earths, many poorly defined borders between private and public initiatives. The financial crisis was followed by that of sovereign debt and governments have been forced to take emergency measures. Fiscal consolidation plans often make provision for cuts to spending programmes rather than any rise in taxes. The new Stability and Growth Pact does not only look at countries’ balances but also calls explicitly for cuts in public spending. In this way fiscal consolidation tends to redraw the boundaries of state intervention, arresting the almost unstoppable advance of the public Leviathan since the second world war, when public expenditure as a share of GDP doubled in many countries. The questions being asked by politicians and economists concern not only what to cut, but how. There are those who, like Chancellor Merkel, have called on the euro-area governments to introduce into their constitutions, therefore into laws that are difficult to change later on, the obligation of achieving a balanced public budget. This would mean depriving them of the possibility of adopting anti-cyclical policies to mitigate the effects of the recession. The English government has proposed reducing the role of the State in social protection, by involving the third sector directly and moving from the “Welfare State” to what they now call “Welfare Society” or “Big Society”. The choice is a difficult one because globalization has brought with it an increase in the demand for social protection. In Italy, the State continues to rely on the family as a social shock absorber. Almost everywhere in the advanced countries, an aging population is pushing up pension outlays and demand for health services. Unless we want the State to get even bigger, it is inevitable that there will be a bigger involvement of the private sector in the provision of these services. How can we distinguish between the duties of the public and private in social welfare, health and even education?

Despite the efforts in many countries to reduce debt by cutting public expenditure, it would be a mistake to conclude that the role of the State in economics is in retreat on all fronts. The crisis has led to an increase of regulated areas in which limits are imposed on free private initiative, to the point of provoking outcries against the violation of individual freedoms. The decision, for example, of the Obama administration to impose by law the subscription of obligatory health insurance unleashed a barrage of appeals to the Federal Court. Forms of protectionism are also reappearing, strategic funds are being built up to oppose the acquisition by foreign investors of national businesses and there are proposals to reintroduce previously abolished restrictions on trade. There are those among economists, traditionally hostile to imposing restrictions on free trade, who have now found new reasons to protect national industry. It is no longer taboo to hear talk of a “new industrial policy” from those who in the past had openly declared their hostility to State aid for specific sectors. There are debates not only on imposing pay limits for superstars, but also on limiting the size of some businesses, especially in the financial sector, to prevent them from becoming “too big to fail”. Defences are being put in place against the arrival of foreign capital, by defining as strategic sectors which have little in common with considerations linked to national defence, security or the environment. New barriers are being erected to the free circulation of people, including against those who are fleeing from bloody civil wars or where there is violent repression of domestic opposition, if not actual genocides. In short, the regulation and restriction of free private initiative has been anything but undermined and on the contrary, appears to be on the increase, to the great indignation of liberal thinkers.

In this sixth edition of the Festival, we will try to enable everyone to form an opinion on the complex questions defining the new borders of free private initiative currently being drawn in various parts of the planet. We will attempt to understand the reasons and highlight the consequences, using, as always, the categories and analytical tools of economists, but also by asking for help from other disciplines, such as law and philosophy. Again as in previous years, we will introduce new formats for the debates, beginning with the arguments “for” and “against”, in which all the participants will be called on to give their opinions on the issues before and after the debate between the various speakers. This will also allow us to assess the value added of the Festival in changing the perceptions, if not the opinions, of that ever-attentive and well-informed public, which for six years now has flocked between May and June to the extraordinary city of Trento.

This year's Festival of Economics in Trento is devoted to the theme of the borders of economic freedom. But beyond those borders there is also the informal economy, the culture of work without the culture of legality. A culture that may generate some wealth, enable some people to make ends meet, but one which builds no future. Can this economy be forced to emerge? On what conditions? And for what purpose? A series of papers, interventions and speakers will be followed by a concluding debate.

The programme for the day is available at www.ahref.eu and www.festivaleconomia.it.

FREE TRADE

presented by ANDREA FRACASSO

People interact to trade information, opinions, sentiments, but also work, goods and services. An isolated person cannot trade with anyone. A person who has been removed from isolation and begins to interact with others, reveals that the exchange has a positive individual value. If he does not begin to interact, he does not reveal the opposite. In short, it is not the “exchange” in itself that has a positive or negative individual value: rather what has a positive individual value is the “free trade”, in other words the freedom to decide whether to trade or not. Between State and Market, which protects this freedom best?

Information is the soul of the market and free competition can exist only in a market where all the necessary information actually circulates. Between the borders of economic freedom lies information whose availability can expand or restrict those borders. What do Italians know and understand about economics? How do they inform themselves? And how do they manage information asymmetries, often in the field of finance which had a key role in the last global crisis. This and much more is discussed by the President of ISTAT, who conducted a special survey of economic awareness by Italians, the President of ABI, who represents the banking system, and two economists, one specialized in finance and the other in cognitive theories.

WHAT FREEDOM WITHOUT LEGALITY?

presented by GIULIANO GIUBILEI

In our country we feel free: free to express our opinions, to move from one place to another, to choose what to study or what career path to pursue according to our interests.

If you look carefully, this freedom clashes – across broad swathes of Italy – with widespread illegality: not only that of the major criminal organizations but also the less visible but no less dangerous phenomena of corruption, patronage, and the black economy.

A leading magistrate, protagonist in the fight against criminal, political and economic illegality, sheds light on one of the preconditions for economic freedom.

SOCIAL NORMS

presented by STEFANI SCHERER

Social norms condition individual choices, they place limits on individual freedoms. These norms, in turn, are shaped by the actions undertaken by each one of us. This interaction is the driver of social change and moves the borders of individual freedoms. But how and where does this change originate? And how does it spread in time and space? Can it emerge in a free market context or does it require public intervention?

When the financial crisis exploded, all over the world countries were called on to save an economic and banking system on the verge of collapse. Massive intervention succeeded in avoiding the worst. But the cure aggravated sovereign debt exposure, reducing the public resources available for investment in collective projects and threatening the stability of the single currency. Faced with the debt crisis, European states backed each other and pledged to respect stricter public finance parameters. This opened a new phase of slimmer states, at times by virtue of debt thresholds, (Greece, Ireland, Portugal), at others by constitutional obligation (Germany), or even based on a political and ideological programme (the UK). But up to what point can the State retreat and delegate functions and public services to private entities without compromising values and constitutional rights?

In the last few months there has been more reflection on the role of women in Italian society than there has been for many years. Problems relating to gender differences – from quotas for women on management boards to reconciling home and work – are still largely unresolved, both in the world of employment and in the broader economic context, in both the public and private sector. Starting from the direct testimony of three young women who are the winners of a competition promoted by the Vodafone Foundation entitled 'Imprese e Lavoro', with the objective of supporting new entrepreneurial initiatives by women, the debate will offer the opportunity to contribute towards the discussion on the relationship between women and the economy.

presented by PIERANGELO GIOVANETTI

From great millennial empire, until 1500 the technologically most advanced region in the world, China appeared to have entered a phase of inexorable decline. A decline that made it one of the poorest countries in the world. Now China is the second most important country worldwide in terms of total income, and the largest global exporter. Thanks to its apparently unstoppable commercial advance, it has accumulated gold and foreign currency reserves estimated at 2,500 billion dollars. Will this economic and financial empire be the engine of world growth in the twenty-first century? Of will it, on the contrary, give the eco-system a fatal shove? Will the pace of growth in China continue or will it slow under the pressure of demographic change? Finally, will economic progress be sustainable without reforms of the political system?

FREEDOM

presented by LUCIANO ANDREOZZI

Without freedom, there can be neither a ‘good’ society nor a ‘good’ economy. However, economic actors are never completely free, but always bound by the existing laws and institutions, as well as by the wealth (or poverty) at their disposal. Moreover, the market generates interferences and conflicts with other fundamental principles, above all that of equality. Finding the ‘best’ ways to address and resolve these conflicts between freedom and justice is also one of the main tasks of economics – today more than ever before.

A CLIMATE-FRIENDLY FESTIVAL OF ECONOMICS

Protecting and respecting our ecosystem means adopting practices which are not only sustainable, but also increasingly have economic repercussions: indeed sustainability makes economic sense! Saving energy, for example, means saving natural but also financial resources.

The climate changes underway at the moment, analysed and recognised by the main international research bodies, have strong repercussions on the productive and economic system, as well as on the environment. Hence once again this year the Festival is responding to the appeal for environmental sustainability by becoming “climate-friendly”.

Analysis of the 2008, 2009 and 2010 Festivals highlighted the main sources of CO2 emissions. On the basis of this research some good practice has been identified which will allow the 2011 Festival of Economics and all its participants to be fully entitled to call themselves "friends of the climate"

- The energy used for the Festival of Economics, supplied by Trenta Spa (Gruppo Dolomiti Energia), is produced from renewable sources and certified to be 100% clean.
- This programme provides instructions for moving around using public transport, on foot or by bicycle.
- Car Sharing Trentino also offers visitors to the Festival arriving in Trento using public transport the chance to use one of 11 cars available. The service is available to guests staying at one of hotels or guest houses involved in the scheme, or to users of another Italian car sharing service. At the Festival site information is also available about how to get to the Festival in a sustainable manner.
- Info: www.carsharing.tn.it – Tel. 0461 433124 – during the Festival in the area dedicated to the alternative economy, in Piazza Fiera.
- Paper has been reduced to a minimum by encouraging the use of USB media and material present on the web.
- All our printed material (including this programme) is certified by FSC - Forest Stewardship Council. This guarantees that the paper contains wood coming from forests managed correctly and responsibly according to strict environmental, social and economic standards. The Festival gadgets (such as bags, hats and T-shirts) have been produced using fair trade criteria designed to combat exploitation and poverty. Furthermore the T-shirts with the squirrel have been personalised using natural dyes.
- The map at the end of the programme shows all the drinking fountains in Trento: the city's water is fresh and of excellent quality.
- The Festival administration makes use only of glass tableware and wholesome local products; thus traffic pollution is avoided or reduced to a minimum.
- A differentiated waste collection service has been organised in the squares used for the Festival of Economics.

This project has been promoted by the Autonomous Province of Trento – Public Works, Environment and Transport Department and by the Environmental Evaluation Department, in the context of provincial initiatives to safeguard the climate.
